Our Island Correspondence.

Waikapa, Maui, January, 1868. Off again among the gems of the ocean to revel in their beauties, and to luxuriate in their halcyon and health-giving climate! Through a glorious night and a calm sea, that endurable miasma, the Kilauea, had foundered along like a giant mud-turtle, and at daylight we were in front of Lahaina, smiling in a fresh robe of green that gave quite a charm to her faded beauties. We did not delay long, but pushed off, leaving two passengers, who remained behind to taste the Lahaina beverage—I do not know how to characterize it—and had to run a race with our horseback over the mountains to Kalepolepo. We saw them on their winding way, as unsteady as their steeds, and appeared as if the aforesaid beverage had an effect on their equilibrium. La-though generally dry and dusty, has more than any other place on the Islands. It is so plentifully and seems to be easily accessible, and yet there is not a licensed drinking shop in the place. Why should such shameful violations of the law be permitted as are daily practiced in Lahaina? Where are the officers? Do they look upon the law as a dead letter? Is their vision so obtuse that they cannot see natives and foreigners reeling intoxicated through the streets, and not know the cause and where they procured the means of intoxication? If they willfully neglect to perform their duty, their places should be supplied by others who will regard the law and not see it violated with impunity! But the fate of our two passengers reminds me to warn all persons to be careful of imbibing in Lahaina after the warning of the Kilauea's steam whistle!

The morning was calm and delicious. We moved along close to the shore, and at Omalua witnessed the scene of the treacherous massacre of unoffending natives by Captain Metcalf, of the ship Essex—an act which, while it stamped his name with ignominy forever, injured the character of foreigners generally. A stain may be cast on the fair fame of a nation by ignorant and brutal captains and skippers, especially among a people who have not learned to discriminate between the character of a few worthless individuals and a nation. Policy requires that no man should be sent in command of any vessel, unless he be a man of intelligence and character.

We enjoyed the distant mountain view of Hawaii, where the snow-clad Kilauea and Mauna Kea smiled in rosy beauty over the illuminated cloud-veils that draped the island beneath them. Nearer was Kahoolawe and the volcanic island of Molo-kini, while to the left rose the precipitous mountains of West Maui, clothed by their deep woods and shadows, gorges. In the shifting light and shade, as we went past them, they appeared a succession of giant dissolving views. Haleakala, with its broad sunny dome, rose in front, smiling grandly over a wide green vale of beauty. We steamed close to shore, in the calm lake-like waters, and passed a beautiful sheltered cove, which is designed as the new wharf for Waikapa and Waikaloa. The harbor is to be called Mc-Gregor's Landing, in honor of the indefatigable and efficient Captain of the Kilauea. It is well sheltered from the trade winds, protected by high basaltic hills, and has a beautiful white sandy beach. It was unruffled as a quiet lake. A contract has been taken to construct a good road from this point to Maunaloa—one mile distant beyond the point.

We steamed into Maunaloa Bay in front of the finest looking hamlet I ever saw. Its two board warehouses and seven halepals, in yellowish-brown masses, looked like great blocks of metamorphic sandstone on some desert coast, destitute of such ornaments as trees and not surrounded by vegetation. They appeared lonely, desolate and bright-stricken, and created in me a wonder how the inhabitants lived—how they procured their subsistence.

We landed. Procuring a horse of the "cropped and bob-tailed" species from a native, we mounted, passed out of the sand beach on to the green plain, and came in sight of a low, rounded and isolated hill—a cote sans dessein—rising out of the level grass valley, over which hovers a legendary history. It is called Puu-ke-hi-hill of departure, or walking hill. In ancient and consequently pre-historic times, in these Islands, it was the penal point of starting for certain offenses. The offender was condemned to take his departure from this hill, and, with a certain bundle—a log of wood, I believe—was compelled to make the circuit of the Island of Maui and return again to the same spot, somewhat resembling the "ring" punishment inflicted for drunkenness in the U. S. Army, when I went "a soldiering." Desiring to see the landing at Kalepolepo, if not to make a circuit of the Island, I pushed on along the desolate sandy shore and found a large house, surrounded by several indifferent ones, like Fall-staff towers and spreading over his rugged regiment. I was kindly received by Mr. Halstead, who is monarch of all he surveys, and almost as lonely as Robinson Crusoe, although he has men, friends about him. His house, large and barn-like, is situated in a little indentation of the sandy and surf-beaten shore. The landing is good in the absence of a kono, or a strong north wind, and is the point where the steamer touches. Much of the shipping business for Waikapa and Waikaloa is done here, and perhaps it may be remunerative to the proprietor. It ought to be so, for, unless a person is in love with desolation, it offers no inducements as a residence. The eye is soon wearied on a waste of waters and a dreary beach, and is painfully filled with sand as he turns to look at the frowning grandeur of Haleakala or the sand-clouded isthmus that extends towards Waikaloa. I lunched in imagination, turned my jaded steed head toward Waikapa, and worrying through the dry and sandy bed of the channel that formerly divided the Islands of East and West Maui, again stood on the hard and stony ground near Puu-ke-hi-hill, and shaking the sand in a shower from my garments and extricating it from my nostrils, breathed free again, and thought the place I had just left was not inappropriately called Kalepolepo, or dirty of dirties. Letting my steed catch
